ALLUME - Second partner meeting in Malta

<http://allume.eucen.eu>

How can LLL-strategies be developed and implemented in HEI? How can institutions become real Lifelong Learning Universities and how could supporting tools and implementation pathways look like?

In the ALLUME project, funded by the Erasmus programme, EUCEN is tackling questions like this, working together with 10 University partners from different European Union Member states.

The consortium represents a broad spectrum of progressive Higher Education Institutions with a track record on LLL provisions providing best practices in the field.

During the second partner meeting in Malta, the partners presented key findings of the produced case studies and expert visits providing an in-depths portrait on the specific profiles, key success factors and LLL-strategies of the involved institutions. The ALLUME consortium discussed scope and outline of the guidelines for a real LifeLong Learning University, which are going to be developed now and tested and verified in fall in six other European Member States and selected Universities. If you are interested to receive more information about this project please contact the Projects Director at projects@eucen.org or visit the ALLUME website following the link above.

How are LLL strategies developing? How can universities become real LLL institutions? ALLUME can give you some answers.
